Remote job scams are on the rise. Here's what to watch for. ▶

Fake job postings often try to create excitement and urgency before you have time to verify the details.

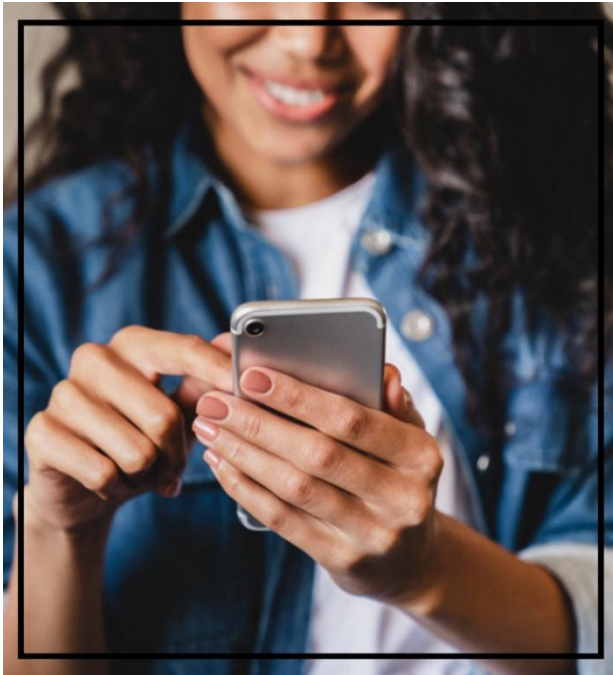

Be cautious if a job offer includes:

- Big pay for very little work
- Requests for upfront payments or “training fees”
  - No formal interview
- Generic emails or messages
  - Pressure to “act now”

A legitimate employer won't rush you into sending money or sensitive information.

Fraudsters are claiming that there are inappropriate images on peoples' electronic devices. Scammers may tell you that they can resolve the issue if you give them remote access to your account or send them gift cards/money/crypto. However, that's not how this should be handled and is a scam. If you receive suspicious communication with concerning claims, reach out to local law enforcement for help.
